71 Ad.

DISTORY OF DELICIT

PORTER

71A6

3160 THE HISTORY

OF

BEIRUT

BY

PROF. HARVEY PORTER, PH. D.

BEIRÚT, SYRIA 1912

This History is reprinted from Al-Kulliych, the Journal of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut, Syria.

PART ONE

BEIRUT BEFORE THE MOSLEM
CONQUEST

OF BEIRUT

THE ROMAN CONQUEST, B. C. 64.

1

Beaut is one of the oldest cities on the Phoenician coast. Sidon and Gebal (Jebail) are probably older, but Beirut stands next, perhaps, in antiquity. As we have no reliable records of the foundation of any of these cities, we are compelled to have recourse to tradition. In the classical authors we have references to a bistorian of Phoenicia, said to have been a native of Beirut, Sanchoniathon by name, who has handed down the tradition that Beirut was built by the god II, or Illion, who was king of Gebal. This personage married a wife named Beirut and built the city and named it after ber. Though this is a fable, it indicates the belief of the ancient Phoenicians that Beirit was the daughter of Gebal and had its origin in pre-historic times, t We might have had something more than fables, perhaps, had the work of Sanchoniathon been preserved in its entirety, for he no doubt had records at his command that have wholly disappeared. A similiar fate has overtaken all other literary works of the Phoenicians relating to this country, leaving only the somewhat scanty monuments to farnish information of its early history.

196

The name Beirut is certainly old, but we are in the dark as to its derivation. Some would derive it from Berothai mentioned in II Sam VIII. 8, or from Berothah which occurs in Eze. XLVII, 16, but the other names. in connection with which these two are mentioned make it improbable that Beirut is the place referred to. Others would derive it from the Hebrew word for wells, Biaroth, the Phoenician term being the same, as the two languages were much alike: This derivation would indicate that the place was noted for its wells in ancient times; a conclusion which is quite possible, since wells were numerous until the introduction of the Dog River water.

There is some doubt also as to the location of the ancient city. It was probably not on the present

^{1.} Philo of Byblus, quoted by Eusebius.

Dr. Rouvier, who sile. studied the antiquities of Beirnt very carefully, locates the ancient town on the south side of the cape, at a point on the old Sidon road, near the river Ghadir, where he thinks he has found an old Phoenician necropolis. The site is farther from the sea than most Phoenician towns, but we have other instances of a similar location such as that of the city of Tripoli, which was, no doubt, a scaport like Beirat. The Phoeniclans often drew up their ships out of the water in winter, when navigation for the most part ceased, naturally selecting a sandy beach for this purpose. The south side of Cape Beight offers better facilities for such beaching than the north, where the present city stands.

THE earliest authentic records we have of Beirnt are to be found in the Tell-el-Amarna tablets, discovered in Egypt in 1886. These are letters. from the governors, or princes, of various cities and districts in Palestine and Syria to the king of Egypt. who had appointed them and was their suzerain. They were, for the most part, native princes who had been compelled to submit to Egyptian authority, which at that time prevailed Diroughout the country. in the reigns of Amenhotep III and IV the Hittites and Amorites from the north attacked the princes subject to Egypt, Matters became so desnerate that the latter applied to Egypt for help, the letters above referred to being written mostly for this purpose. They date from the early part of the 14th century B. C. Beirnt is among the cities represented in this correspondence. It had its petty king like the others, but whether he was a native or not we do not know.

of Egypt were written when the bands of the Amorites were attacking Gebal about 1380 B. C. The king of Gebal, a certain Rib-addi, was so hard pressed by the enemy that he wrote to the king of Egypt repeatedly for help, but none was given. In one of his letters he complains that all his territory between Gebal and Beirut had been occupied by the enemy. He indicates that Beirut helonged to his jurisdiction, which fact gives color to the tradition that the latter was founded by Gebal. At about this same time the letters from Beirut were written. They are three in number, the first only being complete. This runs as follows.

"To the king, the breath of my life; Amunira, thy servant, the dust of thy feet. At the feet of my lord, the king, seven and seven times I fall. Furthermore I have heard the words of the tablet, which my lord, the king, sent me. And upon hearing the words of the tablet of my lord. the king, my heart rejoiced and my heart shone brilliantly. Furthermore, I am keeping close guard, and am watching Beirot for my lord, the king, until the arrival of the troops of my lord, the king. Furthermore, as to the man from Gebal, who is with me, I am indeed guarding him until the king shall core for his servant. Furtherlet my lord, the king, know of the action of his brother, who is in Gebal, that he has given the sons of Rib-addi, who is with me, to the king in Amurri. Furthermore, I have truly placed myself and my horses and my chariots, together with all that I possess, at the disposition of the troops of my lord, the king. Again I fall at the feet of my lord, the king, seven and seven times."

^{1.} Winckler, Tell-ci-Amarna Letters, 123-130.

"The man from Gebal" mentioned in this letter, was doubtless Rib-addi. who, for some reason or other, was obliged to flee to Beirut for safety, leaving his brother and family behind. Perhaps his brother had expelled him, since he seems to have proved a traffor by delivering Ribaddi's sons into the hands of the enemy. Gebal was afterwards taken and Rib-addi disappears. He was probably slain in the capture of the city. It would appear from the letter that Amunica had asked for help which was promised and he was awaiting the arrival of the troops. The second letter from Beirut is so mulilated that nothing can be made out of it. The third also is fragmentary, but we may gather from it that Amunira was looking for ships to arrive at the port of Beirut with reinforcements, and that he was to forward the ships to some other place, probably Gebal. It is evident, however, that they did not come in time, for we learn from the letters of Ribaddi that Beirut fell into the enemy's hands before Gebal. The coast region thus became wholly subject to the Amorites while the Egyptians were driven from Syria.

About one hundred years later we find the Egyptians again in Syria disputing the possession of it with the Hittites. Rameses II penetrated into North Syria and probably occupied Beirht, since we find his monuments at Dog River. The first of his steine, as such inscriptions are called, was set up in the fourth year of his reign, 1388 B. C. Some years later he set up two more, but they are, unfortunately, so badly defaced that nothing can be made out of them.

^{1.} Breasted : Hist, of Egypt, p. 333-330

Ш

Bander the Egyptian dominion but of less importance than Gebal, upon which it seems to have been more or less dependent politically.

That Beirot was engaged in the commercial activity of the Phoenicians is undoubted, for Poseidon, the god of the sea, was its tutelary deity as appears from its coins. These latter exhibit frequently the type and symbols of this god, such as the trident and the dolphin. Other Phoenician critics paid homage to Poseidon likewise, but his emblems were not adopted as so distinctive of them as of Beirot. The mythology of the city is full of references to this deity. On the coins he is represented driving in his chariot, drawn by four sea-horses. We also see him standing on the prow of a ship, holding the dolphin in one hand and the trident in the other. In another case he is represented as seizing the nymph Beroe with his right hand and holding the trident in his left. Others exhibit him standing on the deck of a ship with the usual emblems of Poseidon in his hands. Some coins have only the trident to represent him. These various representations of the god of the sea show us to what extent the Phoenician inhabitants of Beiret honored him. They evidently were extensively engaged in commerce and trade by sea and thought it for their interest to propitiate the god whom they supposed had control of the waves or, otherwise, he 'might bring disaster upon them.

Another deity, whose cult was very common in Beirat, judging from the testimony of the coins, was Astarte, the Ashtoreth of the Bible, closely allied to the Venus of the Romans. Her temple often appears with the statue of the goddess within. Her worship would naturally be domesticated at Beirut from its close connection with Gebal, the special center of this call. The Gebalites used to celebrate the rites. of Venus and Adonis at Nahr Ibrahim, called the Adonis River in ancient times. The funous temple of Venus at the source of this river, at Afkat, was visited and maintained

^{1.} The ruins of this temple could still be seen at this place, the Apheca of the ancients, until a landslide in the spring of 1911 almost obliterated them.

ኍ

chiefly by the inhabitants of Gebal and Beirht. Baal was of course worshipped at Beirht, as he was in all Phoenician cities. He was usually identified with the patron god of the place, "banl" meaning master or lord, and being the term for the cluef deity. Thus he was here identified with Poseidon, while at Tyre he corresponded to Hercules, or Mckarth. The sanctuary which, we know, exis ed on the spot where Deir-.I-Kul'at now stands, was dedicated to the Baal worshipped at Berrat though he was there known as Baaito trigod, as we learn from the inscriptions 1 These latter are not older thou Roman times, but the name is certainly not Roman and the cult dates from times more remote. Market is evidently Phoen con, being derived from the root "rakad", to leap or dance, referring to the well known e istom of leaping or dancing around the altar in worshipping and offering sacrifice to Baal. The custom is seen in the story of the sacrifice to Bud on mount Carmet in the days of the det Detr-el-Kufat is the site of one of the high places of Baal which were frequented by the inhabita to of Beirnt, visited on festive occasions or for the performance of special its of worship, like the discharge of yows.

^{1.} Quar. St. of Pal. Ex. Fund 1898, p. 34; Melanges de la faculte orientale de Beyrouth. Tome I, p. 161-2.

^{1.} I Kings 18: 20.

IV

FTER the period of the Tell-el-Amarna tablets we glean little or nothing about Beirgt from the ancient monuments until Roman times, but we may infer some general facts concerning its affiles from the statements relating to other Phoenician towns. As the power of Egypt declined, the dominton of the Hittites avenced from the north. The history of this people is obscure because their monuments. have not yet been deciphered sufficiently to reveal their origin and course of development. The most we know about them comes from their enemies, especially from the monuments of Egypt. The center of

been at Boghaz-Keni, in Asia Mmor, but they afterwards pushed into Syria where they were found in the days of Rameses II, of the XIX danasty, who reighted in the latter part of the 14th century B. C. Their Syrian capital was at Kadesh, on the Orontes (Nahr-el-'Asi), a few miles to the south of the present city of Huns. They must have held some power over the Phoenician towns, as did the Egyptians, but we know nothing, as yet, of their dealings with those colors.

Later the Assyrians appeared and established their authority over Phoenic i. We learn from the monuments that Assur-nazir-patoverran northern Syria, advancing as far as the Lebanon, and the Phoenician towns of Aradus, Gebal, Sidon and Tyre were compelled to send him presents, or tribute. Beirut is not mentioned among the conquered towns, perhaps becruse at the time it was regarded as a dependency of Gebal; but it, too, must have submitted. The Assy nonleft a record of this myasion on the rocks at Nahr-el-Keib. This was in the first half of the niath century B. C From that time on the kings of Assyria extended their authority gradually until it embraced all western Asia. The Phoenician towns of course were included, though they were generally the last to submit as they could be succored from the ser. The coast lands were certainly overrun by the Assyrians, as the now mate tablets at Nahr-el-Kelb testify. Ben't was, of course, made subject, although not specially mentioned, for it could not have escaped while stronger towns, like Sidon, whose subjection to Assyria is asserted, were unable successfully to defend themselves. It was probably required to pay tribute, while allowed local autonomy. The same may be affirmed of the Babylonian rule which succeeded the Assyrian at the end of the seventh century B. C. when Nebuchadnezzur subdued all Syria and Palestine, and left a long vis riplion at Dog River, recounting his exploits. The Babylonian dominion was overthrown by the Persians under Cambyses in 527-522 B. C., but the Phoenician cities were left with a measure of local independence, as their coins testify. We bave no coins of Beirut from this period, but those of Aradus, S.don and Tyre exist.

V

Tris well known that Alexander, the I Great, marched along this coast on his way to Egypt and that all the towns submitted without a contest except Tyre which he took and destroyed. After his death, in 323 B C., Ptolemies of Egypt took the possession of Phoenicia. Beirht was of some importance under their rule as is again evident from the coins struck here by their authority 11 is coinage still bears the trident, the ancient symbol of the city in the days of its freedom. A little subsequent to the year 200 B. C. the Ptolemies were expelled from Phoenicia and the Seleucids took their place, remaining in possession until the fall of their kingdom in 65. B. C.

During this period Beirht acquired some distinction by its opposition to the usurper Tryphon, who dethroned Antiochus VI. Beirut had to suffer for its loyal devotion to Antioclass. It was destroyed by Tryphon when he later got possession of it, in 149 B. C. But it did not remain long in rains, for there exists an inscribe weight, Learning date of 128 B. C., with the name of Nikon, the agoranomos, that is, the inspector of markets for the city to This being only twelve. views often the destruction by Pryphon shows that it soon recovered, since the existence of such an officer is an agoranomos indicates a municipal government. The automomous coins of Beirut, with dates ranging between 176 and 14 B. C., give evidence of its importance. Some of them bear the figure of Poseidon, as before described, with the legend in Phoenician which may be rendered in Arabic characters thus:

1. Al-Meshriq, Vol. l. p. 17.

"Laodicea, a mother in Canaan" which seems strange for a coin of Beirut, but the symbols and type are those of this city, and Dr. Rouviert concludes from this that the coin really belongs to Beirut. The expression, "a mother in Canaan", means a metropolis and shows that Beirut occupied a foremost position among the cities of Phoenicia during this period.

^{8.} Les monnaies autonomes de Beryte par le Dr. Rouvier; (Revue numismatique, 1898 pp. 437, 640)

stable nels

BLIRUT UNDER ROMAN RULE B. C. 64 TO A. D. 633.

V1

Panglom of the Selevands or no-balf of Rome in 64 BC, and spent the winter following at Dam is cus regulating the affairs of Sy. a Beirut of course felt the change of government and was destined to attain, under the Romans, a degree of magnificence it had never before known. The full effect of Roman rule was not felt until the reign of the Emperor Augustus. He made Beirut a Roman colony and advanced it to the highest dignity among the cities of Syria. Here the settled the veterans of some of his legions who had fought bravely for bun at Actium in 31 B. C. Augustus selected Beirut as their residence, bestowing upon the city Roman rights with various privileges and adorning it with beautiful temples and other public buildings. We do not know the year when Beirat was constituted a Colony, but we learn from the coms that it had advanced to that dignity in the days of Augustus from whose reign its prosperity dates. The Tree peror made Vespasanus Agrippa, who married his daughter Julia, governor of Beirût. As a consequence the city received the name of Colonia Augusta Julia Felix, numerous examples of which title appear on its coins. Agrappa was it strumental in elevating Benut to the noble position it attained in Roman times and in making it one of the magnificent cities of the East. He visited the city in 15 BC. From that year until its destruction in 551 A.D., a period of 565 years, Beirul was a leading center of Romancivilezation in Syra-Most of the antiquities of the city date from that period. Not only w'thin the limits of the present town but in the suburbs also we find Roman remains, among the most noteworthy of which are those of the aqueduct in the gorge of the Beirut river. The Romans made Beirut a great commergal emporium. It became the chief port of Syrna and the station of the fleet which dominated the eastern Mediterraneau The territory to some distance around was made subject to the government of the colony and the lands tributary to it are said to have included the adjacent parts of Lebanon extending even into the Baka".1

The grandeur and number of the public buildings that adorned Beirut may be inferred from the numerous granite columns scattered widely over the site of the ancient city. Many bave disappeared during the last forty years but a number are still to be seen, and wherever excavations are made in the old town they are hable to be brought to light. Some are still in sita. like those near the Banwabetid-Dirki, and others may be seen in fragments, some of these being use I for street rollers and for other purposes. Formerly a number of them were visible under water at the port, now covered by the present government buddings, but some are still to be seen in the water to the east of it They must have belonged to temples or other public baildings near the sea and were probably thrown into the water by the great earthquake that destroyed the city by 551 A. D. These granite colorins must have come from far up the Nile in Egypt, as we have no granate quarries in Syria. They were broughthere at great expense and their number indicates the lavish mamer in which the Romans adorned their colonial municipality.

^{1.} This is testified to by the coins of Heliopolis (Baalbek) which indicate that portions of the same legions (V and VIII) as those stationed in Beirut were settled the also. (Eckhel Doct. Num. III 335).

VII

FTER Agrippa, the Roman, the A Jaw shekings of the same name embellished the city and adorned it with public buildings. It was here that Herod brought to trial his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, for conspiring against him. They were probably innocent of the charge but Herod was as wage brute, suspicious of everybody. These sons were the offspring of his wife Marianne, whom he ladalready murdered, and because of their mother were beloved by the Jews more than his other children. Hence the king's suspicious nature was aroused to jealousy and he determined to put them to death. As he held his throne by the favor of Augustus only, he did not dare to execute them without his consent. He, therefore, wrote to the emperor concerning them, asking his will in the matter. Augustus replied that he might bring them to tr. I before a proper court and suggested some place near Beirut, where the Roman governors in Syria and seconds for the purpose. He chose Belrut itself but did not bring his sons here. He quartered them at Platana, on the Damoor, and had them tried in their absence. Of course they were combemned, as he accused them most vehemently and in an indecent manner, making it clear that he wanted them condemned.1 He would not allow the assessors to examine into the evidence, but on his own authority declared them guilty and asserted that he had full permission from the Emperor to do as he pleased with them. When the assessors saw that he was determined to have sentence passed against them, they confirmed his judgment but advised that they should not be put to death. This, however, was not to Herod's mind and he had them executed not long offer.

¹ Josephus; Ant. XIX, 7, 5 and XX 9, 4.

^{1. 18.} XVI, 11, 4.

Beirut became renowned, during the Roman period, for its great law school, perhaps the most famous in the empire, although there were others at Alexandria, Rome and Constantinople. It flourished from the time of Alexander Severus, A. D. 235, to the destruction of the city in 551. The course of study occupied five years militie graduates were sare of finding business enough in the Roman empire, noted for its courts and scientific administration of law, It is said that the court of the practorian prefect in the East could alone furnish employment for 15d advorates, among whom two, at a sol ry of sixty po nuls of gold, were chosen annually to defend the causes of the treasury. On account of the great opportunities offered to its graduates for advancement in the empire, this famous school was frequented by thousands of students, But Ben'at offered advantages for culture outside. the law school. Men distinguished in other walks of life such as Valerias Probus, the celebrated grammar-or obtained their education here. The distinguished jurist, Ulpian, who became the legal adviser of Alexander Severas, was probably educated here although his pative place was Tyre. It is interesting to notice that Beirut, in being according to the chief nuiversity town of Syrambus ing a color the chief nuiversity town of Syrambus ing a color the chief nuiversity town of Syrambus ing a color the chief nuiversity town of Syrambus ing a color the chief nuiversity town of Syrambus ing a color the chief nuiversity town of Syrambus ing a color the chief nuiversity town of Syrambus in the chief nuiversity town of Syrambus index the empire of Rome

^{1.} Gibbon; Declime and Fall of Rom. Emp. ch. XVII.

When Vespasian, while he was engaged in the Jewish W r. A. D. 69, was proclaimed emperor by his troops at Cresarea, he came to Beirat on his way to Rome. Here he received the congratulations of the people, many embassies coming from Syra and other provinces, bringing with them crowns and declaring their loyalty to the new emperor.

Mucianus, the governor of Syria, also came and assured him of the joy of the infabitants of the province at his elevation and declared that the prophe in every city had taken the oath of fidelity to him.

Vespesian left his son Titus to finish the war. After the capture of Jerusalem, Titus made a progress through the find and exhibited shows it various places, notably at Carsire can Palestine, in honor of his victor of the Afterwards came to Beirüt where he therefor some time, and while here he celebrated his father's birthday with great pomp. The magnificence of the shows which he exhibited was probably the greatest that the city had ever witnessed. The amphitheater, built by Herod.

1. Josephus, Jewish Wars, IV, 9, 6

Agrippa, was througed with the multitudes who gathered to gaze upon the destruction of the great number of Jewish captives who were stam, either fighting with with beasts or with each other. He spent large sums in providing this entertainment for the people of Beirht and vicinity.

1. Josephus, Jewish Wars, VII, 3, 1.

ANCHENE SIDRINE AT HEAD OF ROMAN AQUEDIA'S

This period was that of the exten-1 sion of Christianity and it is quite possible that the gospel was preached here by some of the apostles in their journeys back and forth between Antioch and Jerusalem. There is a tradition that Christ himself visited Beirût when he came into the region of Sidon, but the tradition cannot be relied upon. It is quite certain, however, that Christianity became established here in apostolic times and some of the believers in Christ from here suffered martyrdom in the days of persecution under Diocletian and Maximin, in the early p. rt of the fourth century. The most distinguished of these martyrs were Aphian and his brother Aedesins, sons of a wealthy family, who came to Benut for study. Their pur ents were heathen but the your men came in contact with Christian teachers during their stay here and accepted the Christian faith. After finis ang their studies, Aphian went tome for a time but could not rensum because of the opposition of his leathen parents. He, therefore, returned to Syria and went to C. esa rea, in Palestine, where the persocution was especially severe. He joined the disciples there and witnessed their sufferings. One day, as the governor of the city was about to offer an idolatrous sacrifice, At hmu, w'thout, taking counsel of anyone, rushed up to him and laid hold of his arm, remonstrating with him for offering sacrifice to idols. The governor, in anger and astonisiement as was natural, had Lim seized, terribly beaten and torn, and east into prison for his temerity. Aphian endured all calmly and withont complaining, having expected such trentment and being prepared for it. In prison he was tertured by having his feet put into the, stocks and his legs stretched apart for a night and a day. He was then The offibrought before the judge. res tried to force him by terrible tortures to renounce his fattit. His sides were torn, the fless being mangled to the very bones, and he received such a multitude of blows . as face and neck that they besame so swollen that his friends could scarcely recognize him. As he would not yield, his termenters covered his feet with cloths soaked with oil and then set them on fire, which consumed the thish to the very bones. His sufferings were intense but he remained unmoved through d all. Strange to say, he lived and was taken back to prison holding firm to his futh. Again he was brought before the judge and witnessed the same confession and then his tormentors, in despair, threw him, into the sea. An earthquake which seems to have followed immediately after, caused a tidal wave to cast the mangled body back upon the shore. He was honored as a distinguished martyr, although he was only one among many. His brother, unterrified by his fate, imitate in him for, in Alexandria, where similar persecutions were going on, he attempted to prevent the judge, who was torturing the Christians, from executing his purpose. He, too, suffered martyrdom like Aphian 1 Their story indicates that the university of Beirut had by that time come under strong Christian influence.

^{1.} Mark, VII, 24.

^{1.} Eusebius; Martyra of Palestine

I must be at about this period I that we are to correct with Beirfit the story of St. George and the dragon. St. George is said to have geen a "soldier under Docletore who so fered mostyrdom in the third century. Bit Diocletian did not begin to persocute the Christians until the beginning of the fourth century, the first edict being issued against them. at 303 A.B. This shows that the story is probably apocryphal though its general acceptance in antiquity makes it worthy of mention. The site of his martyrdom is disputed, some placing it at Nicomedia, others. at Lydd, in Palestine, and others of Beurit As the story goes, a mighty monster infested the territory of Beirut and the ichabitants were obliged to sacrifice a young maiden annually lest be should destroy the place. One year, the lot falling upon the daughter of the governor, she was taken out to the accustomed place of sacrifice to be delivered to the monster, She prayed to God for deliverance and it came in the person of St. George who appeared just in the nick of time, slew the monster, and delivered the maiden to her father. (As a thank offering the governor built near the river a church which was dedicated to the saint and a feast was instituted in his honor which used to be celebrated, during the middle ages, by both Christians and Moslems). This is the origin of the name of the bay which has to the east of the river, still called St. George's bay.

the old heathen legend of Perseus and Andromeda translated into Christian terms and revised to suit Christian ideas.

X.

Instead by an earliquike that destroyed a portion of the city and frightened those of the inhabatants who still ching to bestream ideas so that they abandoned is otherwise. Although some of them ideas went back to their earlier faith, Be rut was for the most part Christian from that date.

Other shocks were felt in 194 and 502, but they did little damage to Beirnt although Sidon and Tyre were destroyed. The got calamity to Beirnt, however, occur ed in 551, as has been mentioned. That earthquake was felt all along the coast but ac-port you see. I am become one tomb. To some other place, free from sorrow, shalt thou urge with sounding oar thy advancing back. Such was the will of Poscidon and the hospitable gods. Farewell, sea-faring men; farewell to you who fare on land.!"

^{1.} Ludolph von Suchem, who visited Beirût in 1350 A. D. refers to the story; and adds that St George brought the people of the city and surrounding country to accept Christianity. (Pilg. Text Soc. Vol. XII).

BEIRUT SINCE THE MOSLEM
CONQUEST

PART TWO

^{1.} Palatine Anthology; IX, 425-427.

where so severely; shere. The tidal wave that followed was perhaps more destractive than the staking of the earth. It is said that the sea receded for the distance of a mile and then returned with such force upon the land that it swept all before it, sucking the ships in the harbor or dishing them on the shore and engolling thousands of the inhabitants. The buildings were all destroyed and the survivors among the inhabitants left the place in feur of despair. The professors of the university and the merchants went to Sidon until the city should be restored. The reconstruction was going slowly forward, when a fire swept away most of the new backlings, thus giving the finishing blow to the city. The law school was given up and the population dwindled so that the place remained small and unimportant for centuries

This citimity was celebrated by the ek poets, one of them, Joannes Burbucatios, being a contraporary of the event. He represents the city as saving: -

"Here am I, the unhappy city, lying in ruins, my citizens dead men, alast most itt-fated of all ! The fire god destroyed me after the shock of the Earth-shaker (Pose)don). Ah mel brom so much lovelsness I'am become ashes. Yet do ye who pass me by bewait my fate, and shed a tear is honor of Berytus that is no more " "Where is Aphrodite guardian of the city, that she may look upon the shelterless haunt of the dead, once the abode of the Graces? A tomb of tumbless man is the city, under whose ashes we lie. Beroe's many thousands, Inseribe upon a single stone above us, dear mortals] who survive office lies Beryins, lamented city. buried above ground."

Sailor, stay not thy vessel's course for me, nor lower thy sails; dry land is the

Islam swept over Syrain the early airt fillac 7th century, Beirut was not a large town as it had never recovered wholey from the shock of the each quake acthe previous century. Chase par tly it is rarely noticed by the writers of the West, and were it not for the recent discovery by one of the Jesuit fathers of an Arabic manuscript, in Paris, published in the Moshriq (Vols. 1 & II) we should have very few materials for triening the history of the city in the Middle Ages. The author of this history was a certain Salih bin Yal va who traces his descent from the "Princes of the West", a ne of chieftains who, like feudal lords, ruled over the regions of Lebation adjacent to Beirht. The city itself was at times under their control though their center was 'Arandon in the Lebanon. The author lived, as it appears, in the 15th century and his notices of Beirht for the period from the conquest to his own day are rather scanty but serve to fill a gap that would be almost barren without them. Much of what follows has been derived from this source

After the Moslems had captured Damascus, in 635 A.D., Yezid was appointed governor of Svria and proceeded to subdue the adjacent regions. Beirut seems to have come under his control and is mentioned as paying tribute to the Caliph in 638A.D. The Moslems began to settle here and gradually supplanted the Christian population until the city became chiefly Moslem.

Silth bin Yahya mentions, some of the residents of Beirht in this period who became distinguished, among them al-Auză'i whose personal name was 'Abd-ur-Rahman blu-Omar, He was regarded as the Imam of Seria and the great Sevent of his day. He was learned in Islamic tacology and law and his doctrine was In ld as authoritative in Syria for 20 i Vers The Arabs of Spaniare said to lave followed his opinion also, S. lib bin Yiliya declares that his reput it on was so great in Syria that his affective was a perior to that of the Caliph It was speci ily wknowledged in matters of tradition. He is said to have been born in Baalbek in 707 or 712 A D (A H. 90 or 95), but he afterwards removed to Beirut where he became distinguished. He buried in a village called khuntus. the was a devotee in his religion and his sainthood is quite probably commemorated by the old Moslem mazar on the coast south of Beirut, near Bir Hasan, which is still venerated, though it is uncertain whether this is the place referred to as Khuntus. His son followed in his footsteps as a religious devotee but no literary works are ascribed to him as are attributed to his father.

11Z

EIRUT became the port of Da-Diamsons in time of the Ommind Caliphs and has so remained ever since. It was highly esteemed by the Ommads and one of them, Walld I, who reigned from A. D. 705 to 715, is said to have written some verses to praise of Beirdt. A fleet was estabhalf I here which used to issue forth to plander Cyprus and the islands of the Archipelago. In the year 1015 al-Hākim bi-amr-allāb, the Fatimite Sultan of Egypt, who also ruled this coast, bestowed Beirut, together with Tyre and Sidon, upon a certain al-Fath who is stated to have derived from these cities a revenue of 3 .0,0 10

^{1.} Abu-l-Fida, under year 157. At-Tabari mentions him, in the appendix to his history, among those dying in A. H 156.

dmars. Al-Hakim was the head of the sect of the Druses and was regarded by them as an incarnation of the derty. His followers were persecuted and driven from Egypt, many coming to this country and settling in the Lebanon, Here they had connection with Beirnt as we shall have occasion to notice. During the rule of the Fatimite dynasty in Eygpt from A.D. 909 to 1172, Beirut seems to have subject to them for the been most part. This situation continued until the period of the Crusades, when it fell into the hands of the Seljakian Turks with the rest of Serie

It was the bad treatment the pilgrims from the West received at the hands of these. Turks that was the exciting cause of the Crusades. This series of expeditions from Europe continued, at intervals, for 200 years, during which the land and especially the coast towns, resounded with the din of war. The first Crusade passed by Beirnt, pursuing its way to Jerusalem, and did not delay to reduce the city, nor any of the chief towns on the coast, although the Crusaders had taken Antioch and Tripoli. II was a comparatively small force that the people of Berrit witnessed pas sing as walls since the immense bost of sone 300,000 men, who had set out from Europe in 1036-7, lad dwindled to 20,000 before it reached this city They were, however, the flower of the European chivalry and performed prodigies of valor in their subsequent conflicts. Jerusalem fell in 1993 and the Crasaders then set about subduing the rest of the country. Beirat did not fall into their bands until 1110, according to Salih bin Yahya, who says that it was taken by assault after a desperate defense and that the captors inflicted great suffering upon the inhabitants, slaying many and dragging others into captivity. This may well be believed for it was the custom of war in those days.

William of Tyre, in his history of the Crusadest gives an account of the stege with some detail. He says that Ballwin, king of Jerusalem, called to his aid Bertram, count of Tripoli and beleaguered the city by scaland land, collecting galleys from the coast towns in his possession. From the pine forests in the neighborhood, which seem to have been abundant then as now, he secured timber for the construction of ladders, bridges, catapults and other machines for carrying on the siege, besides huge towers from which to attack the defenders on the walls. The work was pressed forward with all vigor. The besieged were given no rest by day or by night for two months until they were quite worn out with the fatigue of constantly defending the walls. At list some soldiers leaped from one of the lowers upon a part of the wall while the rest of the army was making attacks in various other quarters and keeping the defenders fully occupied, and others at the same time planted their ladders and reached the top of the wall in that way. France thence they leaped down and opened one of the gates, thus letting in their comrades. When the besieged saw the enemy within the gate they fled

i. Bk. XI, Ch. 13,

toward the port, hoping to escape by the galleys there anchored, but the fleet of the blockading squadron was on the alert and drove them back. They were thus caught between two tires, as it were, and were out down. A fearful carnage ensued and few would have escaped the sword had not the king interfered and put an end to the slaughter. According to the account of William of Tyre, this occurred on April 17th 1111, but he states in the beginning that the siege took place in 1110, which corresponds to the date given by Salih binYaliya and is probably the correct one.

NIII

🚺 FIRUTion raied in the 👝 as it D the Crosaders until 1187 during which period many minor conflicts took place in the vicinity between them and the Mostems who still held Dan iscus and the Labanon, Buhlar, the chief from whom the princes of the West, above mentioned, were descended, carried on a war with the Crusiders from his station in 'Araman. He gaine la decisive victory over the Franks at the Ghadir in 1151, winning distinction for his valor and success. He died in 1157, but lus descendants continued to Lold their possessions in the mountain, When Staulin came to the floore of Egypt and Syria, the Crusaders found in h m a foeman worthy of their steel. He was the hero of the Crasades on the Moslem side as Richard of the Lion Heart was on the side of the Christians, He does not yield to the litter in chivalry or warlike ability and is even superior to him in fidelity to his treaty obligations. He gained victory after victory over the Christians and gradually forced them out of their possessions of Palestine and Syria. In the year 1 183 he attacked Beirut. He had secured a fleet from Egypt and assembled an army in the Buka' and stationed sentinets on the summits of Lebanon to botily him as soon as the ships should appear. But the Franks also collected ships from Acre and Tyre to ward off the attack by sea. Saladin came over the mountain with his army and assaulted the city on all sides with such force and persistence for three days that the defenders were scarcely able to cit. Stones and darts were a chied upon the walls. and town so hereely and unrenattingly that the besieged scarcely dared to show themselves, but they returned the fire is best they could and inflicted greater loss upon the enemy. Saladin tried to mine the walls but the besieged countermined and thus thwarted his projects. The fleet also came to the aid of the city. and Salidin, being apprized of the approach of a relieving army of the Franks, abundoned the siege.

William of Tyre, Bk. XXII, Ch. 17-16;
 siege also noticed by Aba-l-Fida under the year A. H. 528, but without particulars.

XIV

Free Salidin's great victory at Hallin in 1187, Palestine and the coast line fell into his bards with the exception of the city of Tyre which he attacked but failed to take, Sidon opened its g. - s without resistance but Bornt refused to surrender and underwent anothe siegeat his hands. Salih bin Yahya s ys that Saladin encamped upon the heights above the town and that the siege lasted eight days. Then the Franks asked for terms and were granted the privilege of taking refuge in Tyre, Seladın appointed a governor over Beirut and then departed to encounter the hosts of the third Crusade which were bearing down upon Acre. While er gaged there he heard of the approach of Frederick Barbarossa. from the north with an acting of Germans, and fearing that some of his recent conquests would fall into their hands he ordered the walls of Sidon and Jebail to be inted and their intabitants transfered to Beirat. It would seem from this that he regarded this city as the strongest and most Important of the three, and it seems to have assumed a leading position in the third Crusade, It was nude the capital of the district which extended from south of Sidon to the lunits of the territory of Tripolithen still in the hands of the Franks The host of the Germans faded away before it reached Acre, Frederick having been drowned in Cilicia, and Beirot saw but a small remnant pass its gates, so few that they were quite unable to make any attack. At the close of the war with Richard, Saladin visited Beirut again and held court here for some days, during which he was visited by Bohemond III, prince of Antioch, with whom he made a treaty. This was the last time that Saladin honored Beirut with his presence. He went from here to Damascus where he soon after died.

After his death the government fell into disorder and the Franks began to recover some of the places he had taken from them. Sidon was occupied and then they advanced on Beirnt. The governor was a certain Isama, a coward, it would seem, for he ran away before the Franks appeared, greatly to the chagrin of the inhabitants who reproached him roundly for his conduct. Some time after, when the Franks were besieging the eastle of late to status at a true, someone as said to have a fitter, someone as said to have a fitter amounter to deliver it up to the late as a status data Beität, a the feet was someone to the matter.

once up the castle, twill not injure your fame.

For he who seeks peace is not worthy of blame

The sarrender of easiles, without war or dispute.

is the law of thamn, made at Scient 1

سلّم الحصن ما عليك ملامه لا ألالم الدي يروم السلامه فعطاه الحصون من غير حرب سنة سنها ببيروت اسامه د

t. The Arabic is as follows : -

7

The Moslems remained in possession of Beirht for ten years. It was retaken, however, by the Franks in A. D. 1197 and held by them for ninty-tive years, longer than any other city in Syria, though it was not independent all this time.

XV

THE Mandakes, who usurped the Haors of Egypt in 1250 A. D., gradually extended their authority ove Syric The Sultan Bebers of this exersive who reigned from 1200 to 1277 A. D., took most of the towns on the coast. His successor, Kelinun, captured Tripoli and destroyed it, but , made a treaty with Beirnt and Jehnil, in which these eithes acknowledged his authority while the Frinks still remarked in possession, In 1294 the city of Aere revolted and was besteged and taken by Sullanal-Melik d-Astmal who slew the inhabitants. This so terrified the other towns which were implicated, that the 16h1bitants fled. Beirat, however, save t itself by making submission while the siege was going on, thus hoping to escape. But the Sultan sent his heutenant, Sanjar, to take possossion, after Iv a had been subdued. He was received by the governor with the usual display, the latter going forth to meet him with a retime of hersemen gaily att red, performing their various evolutions, dispaying their skill in horsemanship. When Sanjar. and entered the eastle, he ordered the inhabitants to app or before him, men, women and children, with their movables. This was done, the people supposing it to be a missing for protection, from the insolence, of the soldiery. But when they were .ssemble I within the castle, he commanded the men to be seized and thrown into the most where they perished. The old men and women and children were spared and sent as prisoners to Damascus and from thence were marched to Egypt, many perishing on the way. Those who sor vived were allowed to return to Be rat or to go to Cypras. The forting intensive destroyed by Sinjir lest the Franks should attempt to retake the city by sen and thus establish themselves once more on the coast.

¥

The danger from the Franks was not imaginary, for in 12 to an expedition consisting of many ships, some thirty of them so large that they carried 700 men apiece, arrived off the port and attempted a landing, but a fearful gale arose that shattered some of the ships and the restabandoned the undertaking.

2

XM

TN the year 1047 A. D. a traveller Lirom Persia, Abu Mu'in Nasir bin Klusrau by name, passed through Beirnt and describes a magnificent arch spanning the roadway, probably the road towards. He ever, as he enloyed the city from that direction. He says that it was fifty ells is height (some 80 or 90 ft.), the side with a ff which were of immense blocks of white stone each of which le estimated weighed a ton and a half, On the top were marble columns 14 or 15 ft in height and so large that two men could scarcely embrace them with outstretched arms, which would indicate a diameter of three feet or more, Above these was an arrade on either side and the great some fifty cubits (75 to 80 ft.). The stones of this arch were 8 cubits broad and estimated to weigh 10 tons each, all beautifully curved. This arch probably belonged to some one of the magnificent buildings constructed by Herod Agrippa, as before mentioned, and may have belonged to a theater or a bath. Abn Mu'in saw no other remarkable buildings standing but the surrounding properties of marble and grante to

The harbor of Beirut was well fortified during the period when it was occupied by the Crusaders. Johannes Photos who visited the place about 1185, shortly before it was captured by Saladia, describes the port as an artificial one, constructed in the form of a crescent with a great tower at the extremity of each born and having a chain that could be drawn across the entrance. That barbor was probably maintained as long as the Franks held possession but after they were driven out the port was neglected.

¹ Pat Text, Vol IV.

When John Poloner visited the place in 14.21 he described the barbor as abominable 2 It was the policy of the Mandake sultans to keep Beirut unfortified, it would seem, lest the Franks should seize it and make it a stronghold for their maranding expeditions on this coast. Al-Mehk ad-Dhahir, however, built a castle, which was garrisoned by the Princes of the West after the Franks were finally expelled Beirut was in constant danger of raids by the Franks of Cyprus, mostly Genoese. We have mentioned that of 1299, and again in 150% a fleet passed here on its way 1 8 lo , which place was plundered, but Ben I was not attarked, proba-Hybria sent was found well garresoned. In 1303 the Franks had r ided the region of the Damur and raptured one of the family of the Aramin princes, besides killing some of his attendants. The prince was ransomed for 3 100 dinars In 1333 the Geloese attacked Berlid with the object of capturing a large ship lying in the port, belonging to the Catalins, who were hostile to them and in attiance with the Moslems. The fight lasted two days with consulerable loss on both sides, but the Genoese succeeded in capturing the ship.

^{1.} Pil. Text, Vol. V.

^{2.} Pil. Text, Vol. VI.

intended is uncertain) and thereupon it poured forth blood and water. It is related that a drop of this blood would heaf those who were sick. John Poloner states that it was kept in an underground chamber. The image or picture was afterwards carried to Rome.

Beirut was frequently visited by pligrims to the Holy Land since it was a commercial center and one could usually get passage from here to different ports on the Mediterranean.

ΔMH

The Franks of Cyprus captured According 1305, and the sultan of Egypt ormied a large fleet to be built at Beirot for the invasion of the island. It made the town a very busy place for a time, but the project was abandoned by the sacceeding sultan because he probably realized that his people were no match for the Franks at sea. In 1381a Genoese fleet appeared at Sidon which they plundered. This was at once reported to Damuscus and a force was forthwith despatched to Beirnt to ward off any attack that might be made upon it. The apprehension of such an at

XXII

Bertrandou de la Brocquière, writing about 1432 A. D., states that if e port of B at t was still landsome, deep and safe for vessels. On one of its joints were to be soon the itmains of a castle which was friendy strong but was then in tuins Healso mentions the relebration of a feest which he wilbesse I. Groups of the mhabitants were singing and shorting, the cannons of the castle were fired and the people of the town launched into the air, very high and to a great distance, a kind of fire larger than the greatest lantern. He was told that they sometimes made use of these at sea to set fire to an enemy's vessel He was curious to flud the composition of this fire, which I e finally did, but after some trouble and by bribing the manufacturer. He does not tell, however, what the ingredients were One wonders whether it might not have been something corresponding to the famous Greek fire. This manner of celebrating a feast reminds us of the fondness of the people of Berrit to-day for rockets in the relebration of feasts.

In the Guide Book, written about 1350. Beirnt is described as a wealthy city. It was noted for possessing a wonderful image, or rather picture, of Ch. st. which Fetellus, as was purted by Nicodemas, and which we spierced by the infidels (whether Jewsor Moslens are tack was well to nided for the fleet appeared off the harbor but retired when they found the city well defended. This movement, however, was only a femt, for when the troops had returned to Damasons the Franks came back and made a vigorous of tempt on the town. There was only a small fort to defend the place and the garrison was plied with stones and fire darts from the stips so vigorously that the defenders were obliged to retire behind the walls. The Franks then landed and attacked the city but the Mosiems railbed and made such a vigorous onset that the enemy was forced back to los ships with great loss, Among the foremost of the defenders was the father of Salah, the author of the history above mentioned, from whom he probably obtained an account of the affair. Notice of the approach of this first was telegraphed to Damascus at may 1 by bondings and a 1 o qu of noise arrived at Beirat by the even og of the following day but too. Lite to take part in the defence, It seems that a regular servi a of bontires by night and carrier pigeons by day was maintained between the two stres for use in such emergeneies. The loss of the Franks was so great in this eacounter that they did not trouble Beirat of via for more thin twenty years. In 1305 however, another Genoese fleet appeared and, the inhabitants being unprepared, took their belongings, and fled from the city to safe places in the mounthat There was no one to defend the place except the Princes of the West and a few of their followe's The enemy landed at some point west of the town, called Sanbatiyeht and plundered it and burned a market near the porc. The Moslems mustered in the vicinity and watched for an opportunity to the ansatragglers that might get so particular from the main body. The Genoese plandered until the middle of the afternoon and then returned to their ships and sailed for Sulon.

^{1.} Pil. Text, Vol. V.

^{2.} Ludolph von Sueliem, about 1350 (Pil. Text, Vol. XII).

7.7

It would seem that the Franks gave up their hostile descents upon Beirnt after this couck and opened up commercial relations which they found more profitable. At first they sent only a couple of ships at a time from Cypras, with goods discording from Venice, but when trade became

1. Perhaps the quarter to the west of the port, now known as As-Samtigeh (4-4-4-1) common a colony of Cypriotes, or Veneticus, were allowed to establish themselves at Beirut where they possessed stores and churches. The trade became so considerable that the revenues from it were of safficient importance to require a regular enstoms service, the surplas revenue being transmitted to Dannaseus. The city rose to new importance; it was once more fortified and a wall was built along the sea front.

7.7

XIX

Beirut remained in the hamis of the Mamlakes of Egypt until the reign of the Ottoman sultan, Selun I, ander when I by were expelled and I sypt itsed was taken Syracfrom that time became a province of the Oltoman Empire and his so remained have some a count of it in the writrags of Henry Maundrell, who passe ed through here in 1697, at Easter, and spent a day in the city. He speaks of the fine situation and the supply of water from springs flowing down from adjacent hills, which water was dispersed all over the city in convenient fountains. He describes the residence of the emir Fakhr-ed-Din, prince of the Drases who had extended his authority in the days. of sultan Murad (probably the fourth of that name) so that he ruled over the coast line from Beirnt to Acre, and seems to have established his chiefresiden ent Beirût. This prince was afterwards forced by the sultan's government back into the mountains. His pulsee is described at some length. It was a bailed in the northeastern part of the city. The buildings at the catrance of which was a marble fountain of great beauty, consists I of several courts, at that time much rumed, or perhaps never completed. There were stables, yands for horses, dens for lions and other wild animals, gardens, etc. which, in their design, would not have been unworthy of any prince in Christendom. He nakes special mention of the orange garden winch was a Targe quadrangle, divided into sixteen lesser sq ... four in a row, with welks between These walks we bordered by orange trees of rarge size and perfect shape which, at the time when he saw them, were loaded with golden fruit, presetting a most charming sight to a European, The squares were bordere lwith stone in we hadranels were ent for conveying water to all posts of the garden. If the gorden had been well kept be thought nothing could have been more delightful. It was then put to so better use than as a to I for sheep and goals so that in menny places the visitors were up to their knees in dist. On the east side of the garden were two terrace-walks, one above the other, each having an approach of twelve steps, and bordered by fine spreading orange trees placed at intervals to furnish suitable shade. On the north were booths, summer houses, and other apartments which were very delightful in summer time. Maundrell attributes the excellence of design manufested in this palace garden to the fact that Eakhr-ed-Dto had been in Hidy and Here had seen similar gardens which had suggested to hua the idea, so much in advance of what the traveller saw elsewhere in Turkey. He inferred that Fakhr-ed-Din must have been much superior to las contemporaries in culture and genus and without their prejudices in regard to steamy, for he saw in one of the gardens pedestals designed for statues, indicating that he was not a very zealous Mohammedan, At one corner of the garden was a watch-tower sixty feet high, and designed to be carried much higher.

40

From this tower a view of the whole city was obtained.

Maundrell mentions the existence of an old church consecrated to St. John, but which had been occupied by the Moslems as a mosque, and another, much inferior, still in the hands of the Greeks. He found it. adorned with pictures, one of which bore the name of Quartus, the First. archbishop of Benut. He saw another picture of some saint with a very large beard, reaching to las feet, and the following story was told him concerning the saint. He was a person of most enment virtue in his day, but to his great misfortune be did not possess a beard. He became very melancholy at this defect, and the devil, taking advantage of his despondency, tempted him by prohasing to give him the desired adornment if he would comply with a suggestion the devil made to him. But the saint, though extremely desirous of obtaining a beard, would not purchase it by such means, and rejected the proposition with indignation, declaring that he would go without a heard forever rather thruobtain it on such terms; and at the s true, t king hold of the downy 1 ift o is chie, with which nature and gradgingly supplied Line as though to swear by it, he found to his astonishment that the laur anmediately began to stretch as he pulled it. Finding it so phable le continued to pull until, lot the lair reached his feet.

At the east end of Beirut Maundrell saw seven or eight beautiful pillars of grainte, three feet in diameter. He speaks of the city wall as still entire on the south side and of certain inscriptions in both Greek and Latin which are well known at the present day. He saw may evidences of the city's uncient magnificence in the pillars and marbles and fragments of statues scattered about, some of them in rubbish beaps, with other relies, which must have been very abundant in those days.

XX

Beirut evidently declined during the 18th century or, at least, failed to make progress. We find it mentioned as a small town of about 500 t inh dut ints only, in the early part of the 19th century the houses being very poor, built of mud and sandstone, the streets parrow and filthy and the port choked with sond t. When, M. bammed Ali Pash i, of Egypt, revolted and occupied Syria in 1832, Beirat, of course, fell into the Lands of the Egyptians and so continued until they were finally driven out by the English, in alliance with the sultan of Turkey. In this contest

^{1.} Miss. Herald, 1824.

Beirnt was bombarded by the English fleet in Sept. 1841 and the siege lasted until the 16th of Oct. when the Egyptian troops evacuated the town. The castle was runed and the houses suffered much damage. Many cannon balls, relies of this bombardment, have been found about the town and are still occasionally picked up. Sace that date the city has grown much until it has become something like what it was in former times, the chief sea port and the university town of Syria.

XXI

THE massacres in Lebanon, which Loc med and espring and son mer of 1869, produced important consequences for Beirht The oathreak began in the latter part of the month of May and continued until the month of August, when the arrival of the French troops put an end to it. The villages on the Lebanon to the south of Beirat were sicke land haraed, the men killed and most of the made children. All the region was thrown into a prince and thousands of refugees, largly women and children, fled to Beirut for safety. As the insurrection spread to the inter-

^{1. 1}bid 1841.

for more fightives excaped to the city until many thousands were steltored here. There was fear of a massucre in Beirnt also ard two merpicut movements began, but the presence of foreign warships to the barbor prevented bloodsned. The French troops began to arrive on the 10 th of August and all further danger of mass, are was over. But the presence. of so many refugees, litterly destitute, and without hope of being restored to their homes for months, and even if restored, unable to support thenoselves or find shelter in their rained Louses, laid upon the people of Beirut a heavy burden. Mor www. sent from Europe and Amer to furnish food and clothing during the winter of 1860-51, as it was impossible for the refugees to be re-established in their homes before the Spring of the latter year. The American inissionaries cared for some 6900 people of the Profestable community for some 2540 more and the other sects did likewise. It was c-tabiled that 100,000 perished in the massacres, mostly men, and t at 15,000 widows, with their children, were to be found in Beirat alone. Many remained here permanently and, as a result, the city grew rapidly after the opening of the French ro 146 Dimerseas in 1863 with a regular transportation server. The population was estimated by Volnes, in 1782, at 6,000 only, and as late as: 1848 it was not more toan 15,900, but from 1860 oaward it has grown apace, especially since 1 e opening of the railway to Damascus and the Hauran and to Aleppo, and the buildring of the port. The population in

¥

1806 was estimated at 120,000 and now is considerably larger established, separating it from that of Damascus, and Berrit became the capital of the provence which has naturally added to its importance. The growth of its educational instabilitions during the last decade has also been very marked and has, at this respect, made it a center of culture for the nearer East.

XXH

N Sept. Joth , 1911, Italy deto always og anst Tulkey and and tary operations commenced by an attack upon Tripoli in Africa. This province was at such a distance from Beirut that no great apprehension was felt here that the war would be exten led to the Syrancoust. As months passed without any hostile demonstrations in the eastern Mediterrancan people became more confident of immunity and business went on as usual. But on the 24th, of Feb , 1912, two Haltin emisers pipeare foff the harbor, taking everybody by surprise, as no intimation of their coming had been received. At seven o'clock in the morning the Italian admiral sent a message to the governorgeneral that the two Turkish vessels in the port, a gunbout and a torpedo boat, must be surrendered by nine o'clock or he would attack them. As the cruisers by some considerable distance out, the message did not reach the governor-general until about Iwenty minutes before the hour fixed and no reply was returned. At a few minutes past nine the Italians opened fire with the result that the gamboat was soon in flames and the torpedo boat somewhat disabled. At twenty minutes past nine the enemy ceased firing and one of the craisers moved up to the entrance to the port. There it discharged two torpedos at the gunboat which was struck, the explosions sending a shaft of water high into the air and completely wrecking the ill-fated vessel.

The torpedo boat was damaged but still affoat. The cruisers then drew off towards the north; it was hoped that the action was finished and people began to breath more freely. Bit after a time the enemy were seen returning and speculation was rife as to what their purpose was. Many thought they were preparing to bombard the city and consternation was general. It soon became evident that they were not satisfied, with their morning's work at the port, as the torpedo boat had not sunk and had, in fact, moved to another part of the harbor, near the Ottoman Bank building. One of the cruisers approached and discharged three volleys of shells at close range which completely wrecked the torpedo boat. One of the shells struck the Bank building, doing considerable damage. The cruisers then moved slowly away to the northwest but did not entirely disappear until after sunset.

The action, besides destroying the hoats, had caused serious damage to the Castom House and other buildings in the vicinity of the port and, what was more to be lamented, had killed and wounded many civillans as well as marines. Of the latter some 55 were missing and of the civilians over 50 were killed or died of their wounds. Altogether the effect upon the city was serious. The inhabitants were wholly inexperienced in modern warfare and tad little conception of the destructive effect of explosive shells and torpedos so that many drew too near the port during the action and suffered in consequence. This struck bad been thrown over the city to the sands on the south during the previous action. The disappearance of the cruisers did not allay the fears of the population and for days they continued to leave the city while rumors were rife for days, and even weeks, that the Italians would return. Business was greatly disturbed and much loss incurred in consequence. It was the most serious affair Beirût has experienced since the bombardment by the English before referred to.